The plagiarism of self.

These words might be mine. Or they might not. After living with them for so long, I can no longer tell the difference.

Copying-and-pasting words from elsewhere into my Word document: the moment I view them in my default font on my computer, they're suddenly "mine."

For our purposes, we will use plagiarism as a synonym for repetition.

Contextualize and recontextualize.

Fictionalize facts deviating from real-life situations.

post-plagiarism is post-modernism without the anxiety of having to correctly answer
what, exactly,
one is talking about

if you read, you are contaminated.
you retain phrases, i'm sure.

a lack of belief in the idea of progress-
"have not"s massacre the "have"s.

maybe if the copy is not realized
it can be called original

what we mean when we say
a faithful copy:
things which have been in contact with each other
continue to act
on each other
at a distance after the physical contact
has been severed

A question:
as a reader,
if 'memoir' is my medium -
how can i avoid using someone else's words?

We don't need the new sentence.
The old sentence reframed is good enough.

All text is used, soiled, and worn. All language presenting itself as new is recycled. No word is virginal; no word is innocent.

self-plagiarism = post-plagiarism towards a new plagiarism slouching towards jstor

I can't remember the last original painting i've seen.

Plagiarist, trouble-maker, saboteur.
Charges leveled against Brecht, all of which he considered titles of honor.

mad magazine collections,

i like the idea of a library, but i'm too loyal to my piles. stacking them up instead of sorting them out. i buy books i don't need, because i know i'll never see it again. i want this copy. this one is mine.

everyone who is truly sick about books can agree. the same people who steal what they can and buy what they can't. there is always an excuse to own another book.
